In praise of “sardità”

What makes Sardinia, its history and the works of Sardinian writers so particular is that the Sardinians have mixed with peoples, cultures and languages and have elaborated their very own linguistic expression in the presence of the languages of the world, as they encountered all those people who sailed here or came to trade or even to make war.

Sardinian and its use in writing is a somewhat complex problem, since this ancient language, apparently rarely present in the written tradition, is in fact strongly upheld by the fruitful relation between orality and writing and by the habit of comparison with the languages of the dominating cultures. This would thus explain the phenomenon displayed by the twentieth century writers who in composing their works in poetry and prose, chose to make use of the various forms of Sardinian as well as a number of even more hybrid linguistic forms.

In their Éloge de la créolité, Jean Bernabé, Patrick Chamoiseau, and Raphaël Confiant claim to have launched “la minutieuse exploration de nous-mêmes”: an archaeological dig that intends to lose nothing of what has been buried by the tormented passing of time.

In our case too, this dig has to reconstruct the interior layers de nous-mêmes, of our culture, thoughts and psychology. We have to reevaluate Sardinia’s one thousand year old history making ethno history its central focus once again, a subject which has played a leading role but which has almost been forgotten in historical and literary-historical reconstructions. In actual fact quite a few Sardinias exist (the Phoenician-Punic one, the Roman one, the Catalan-Aragonese one and the one of the Savoy Household): only rarely has the unitary dimension of Sardinian history been studied, imparted by the people who have lived on the Island for thousands of years, by how they consider themselves and the place, by their visions of the world.

Our great knowledge of this presence of the Sards in the same geographic space, so strongly identified by its insular physiognomy, is equalled by our ignorance. And this lack of knowledge seems to authorise us to also give little value to what we already know. On the other hand, this knowledge obliges us to pay great attention and to a certain extent to consider present, what is actually missing from a documental point of view.

Even more so when we move within the ambit of literary communication and thus within the sphere of perception and the representation of reality or rather, inside the convention that binds the author to the reader.

First of all we should keep in mind that Sardinian authors and readers share a belief, which as the writer Giuseppe Dessì explains, is founded on an idea of time that differs from the European historical one: immobile, “an eternal present” where nothing is lost and everything conserves topicality.

In literature we once again come across the memory of geological eras when the stone that still bears so much importance in the Sards’ collective imagination was forged and likewise, the memory of seafaring and trade, of the first sown seed, of the first wine pressed from grapes when the Nuraghic civilisation was still in the distant future.

And how could it be otherwise with the thousands of monuments, the nuraghes, keeping watch not for the arrival of a possible enemy but rather over the danger of forgetting, of losing one’s memory of self? Just reading one of Grazia Deledda’s novels allows us to see the results of this vigilance, giving rise to the imprinting that is also expressed in the positive semantic value accompanying the adjectives ancient, primitive, prehistoric, defining the quality of a distant time, a lost time, a space and condition torn from the Sardinian people and to which they seek to return.

Likewise we need to pay attention to the cultural relations that the Sards have interwoven with first of all the Latin and then the Italian and Hispanic cultures.

From one point of view we might say that we are talking about a privilege; the possibility of getting an inside look at prestigious cultural universes, to feel as if they were our own.

The Sards have always had ties with the Italian peninsula. They were navigating in the Mediterranean thousands of years before Christ, trading obsidian with the Ligurians, setting up a relationship that was continued and strengthened by the traffic of goods and the linguistic habits of the medieval period. Genoa and Pisa as the gateway to what would become Italy, to the Italian language, culture and literature; a free choice that was reconfirmed throughout the Spanish period, helping us to understand the Italianisation processes that came about centuries later in the union with Piedmont: not the relinquishing of the basic features of one's identity but rather the acquisition of other means of expressing its very essence.

Cultural and Literary History

The Sards come from distant origins to which no one can give a date. And indeed, perhaps there is really no point in asking oneself in which dawn of time man first set foot on the Island. Nor does it make any sense to ask ourselves who this man was, where he came from and what had actually brought him to this land, whether he had made a deliberate choice or rather was driven on against his will by the sea currents and the force of the winds.

This unknown father and the mothers who came with him were the progenitors of a race which can be identified and defined by a single certain fact: the choice of Sardinia as their place of residence. The rest is far less clear and is mixed up in the twisted passing of the millenniums, in the continuous renewal of the bloodline, inevitably modified by the infinite number of contributions that could not be avoided on an island situated in the centre of the Mediterranean, an intermediate port for seafarers, a natural place for meetings and exchanges.

One of the first available pieces of information tells us that at a time dating back to more or less 7000 BC, somebody took obsidian from Sardinia to Liguria. This vitreous paste was used in the Mesolithic and then the Neolithic Age to make tools, knives, arrow or spearheads. Who can say who extracted it, who transported it and on what kind of vessel? Were they natives or did they come from Liguria? Was this meeting marked by violence and a wish to steal or was it friendly and determined by the need to trade? Which linguistic code must they have used to communicate?

In the meantime, pottery working and decorative techniques were developing; statues, houses and graves were being built; sacred circles were being erected; megalithism was emerging, bringing to mind similar happenings occurring in many areas of western Europe from the Iberian peninsula to Ireland; cultural forms were being elaborated which were structured and recognizable for their main characteristics, fruit of local elaboration and capable however of being able to document relations with the eastern Mediterranean cultures and the Iberian peninsulas as well as those with Italy and southern France.

An extremely blurred picture that emphasises how dynamic it really was, if we think that with the decline of obsidian and the development of the use of metals starting from the Copper Age (2900-2300) a “metal fever”, as the archaeologist Giovanni Lilliu calls it, had broken out. These “metallurgists” with their wealth of technical skills, driven by the taste for adventure and hunger for money, set out on courses that led west from Anatolia and from the Aegean Islands towards the Iberian peninsula, France, the Atlantic and the Baltic countries, the Balkan peninsula, Malta, Sicily and Sardinia.

We know very little about the languages spoken in the Pre-Nuraghic Age and in the following Nuraghic Period: only relics have survived to the current day (present in toponomy and vocabulary) dating back to the most ancient times and showing Pre-Indo-European characteristics.

History went on with its game, overlapping different layers and creating the base conditions for the constitution of what seems to us nowadays to be an extremely dense pre-Roman linguistic substratum, where Paleo Sardinian elements co-exist with Punic ones as well as Iberian relics that indicate concord with Basque. Furthermore, as regards the phonetic element, the linguist Max Leopold Wagner has indicated possible points of contact with Gascony, with Sicily and southern Italy, with Berber dialects and with several Hamito-Semitic phonetic conditions.

Who knows if this is the whole story? The VIII century BC sees the beginning of the historically documented arrival of different peoples: Phoenicians, Carthaginians, Romans, Vandals, Byzantines, Arabs, Pisans, Genoese, Catalans, Aragonese and Piedmontese. A different procedure every time, each time a new idiom: words learnt and put in relation with the ancient Pre-Indo-European language which was gradually modified into a substratum that was however alive and kicking, capable of expressing itself in the roots of several words, in many toponyms, in the transformation processes of the superior linguistic layers.

Our lack of knowledge far exceeds the things we know and within our lack of knowledge lies something that can only be imagined since it does not transpire from any relic, from any root or any toponym, namely, the effort that is life, the worries, expectations and the sufferings of men.

It cannot have been simple to pass from one's native language to that of Rome, made necessary when Sardinia was transformed into a Roman province after the breakdown of relations with Carthage.

Once again there is very little cultural and linguistic historical information available for this period; Wagner defined these as the "silent" centuries which saw the development of the process of absorption of the native languages into that of Rome, and then that of the transformation of Latin into Sardinian.

Silent centuries. Darkness. Just like being in the hold of a ship that carries men from one continent to another, against their will and in contempt of every right.

Whosoever is patient enough to observe the passing of time might philosophically think that everything has an end, even the power of Rome. After this event Sardinia passed under Byzantine rule. The linguist records the changes, marked by the fact that Greek became the official language. Then the Eastern Empire also fell and with it the use of Greek.

Thereafter something completely unexpected happened in a land where a native language had not been used for official purposes or in public administration for centuries. Greek is no longer present and the Latin culture has "dried up": there is a risk of losing the ability to speak, if it were not for an unhoped-for resource, Sardinian, from the ancient Pre-Indo-European-Mediterranean substratum, bejewelled with Punic and Berber, Iberian and Sicilian, Southern-Italian relics or derived from goodness knows which other contact, which had been more recently covered by a sediment of Latin.

This was the language to which the Sardinians turned for help for their official documents, written in a vernacular that was born at the same time or even before the other Romance languages. One might even consider this as a fortunate situation, all the more appreciable especially when compared to the sorry cases of peoples who have lost every chance of constructing a language that they can call their own; people who have had to and have to maintain the message of identity through the language of the nation that has conquered them.

It is obvious that Sardinian, which up till then had only been used in the oral tradition, for the needs of day to day life and mainly in agriculture and sheep-farming, could not readily lend itself to use in the most refined kind of writing or in diplomatic-chancery work.

Thus, either by astuteness dictated by the need for survival or by an inherent ability elaborated during the long period of oppression following on at the end of the Nuraghic civilisation, the Sards modelled their documents on the kind used by the nations that had conquered them or with whom they had had diplomatic, cultural or commercial relations. This was logical for a small country that sent its offspring to study in the cities in the east, on the Italian peninsula which already had a number of renowned university centres, or to those in the west on the Iberian peninsula, drawn not merely for study reasons but also for commercial, diplomatic and matrimonial ties. And on the other hand, the sovereign of a small rustic State could not be unaware of the existence of the great culture that was developing on the northern coasts of Provence, landing place for the ships that trafficked with southern France, as well as with Genoa and Pisa.

If there had been a balance of forces, the game would have gone on for centuries in an equilibrium that political and commercial convenience and matrimonial alliances would have kept unaltered. But there was a general logic that concerned the authorities of that time, the empire and the papacy, and they could not but overwhelm a tiny population settled on a land which was attracting the attention of powerful interests.

Nobody on the Island must have noticed when on 4 April 1297, Boniface VIII assigned the Kingdom of Sardinia and Corsica as a fief to James II of Aragon. Perhaps the fact was deemed of little importance, especially because for a quarter of a century nothing happened. In fact, it was only in 1323 that Alphonso of Aragon sent the expedition to conquer Sardinia.

The merit of the event became clearer over the course of the decades which saw an increase in the Catalan presence; Pisa and then Genoa were expelled from the Island; the alliance between Arborea and Aragon was severed and gave rise to a war destined to end only in 1409 when the Catalans defeated the Arborean forces once and for all in the battle of Sanluri.

Meanwhile the famine (and the economic crisis) of 1333 and the black death of 1348 could not but have a negative effect on the already precarious demographic trend. But 1392 also saw the promulgation of the Carta de Logu, Queen Eleonora of the Guidicato (Kingdom) of Arborea's code of laws, written in Sardinian and destined to remain in force until 1827: a sure sign of identity for the Sards.

In 1421 the Carta de Logu was extended to the whole of Sardinia. The local language was thus vested with what was no longer a marginal role in the administration of justice, together with Catalan and Castilian, the language of the Kingdom of Spain.

What is striking is the fact that these languages coexisted in ways that were somewhat surprising. Catalan spread from the cities where it had its major diffusion towards the inland centres, it resisted the unification of the Crowns of Aragon and Castile, continuing to be used in a public capacity until 1643, the time when Castilian came to be permanently used for issuing decrees. In turn, Castilian had a far-reaching effect; it adapted itself to the expressive and spiritual needs of the Sards, to the complexity of their interior world.

We should now add that at every turning point in history, someone or other emerges to reproach the Sards for not having learnt their languages well. The most ancient writer who received a ticking-off was Lucifer (300-370), Bishop and author of written works in a Latin that was deemed as being almost barbaric. Thus the Bishop from Cagliari is to be found at the origin of the Sardinian literary tradition, not merely for chronological reasons but also because he made himself the initiator of a way of writing that has accompanied the Sardinian authors right up to the contemporary age. And this way of writing is caught in the balance between languages and cultures: partly because of the conditioning of the historical circumstances, partly due to a personal choice that ends up becoming the distinctive cipher of a people.

Thus Castile catches on and with such verve in Sardinia that it is capable of overcoming the threshold represented by the end of Spanish domination. Little wonder if Sardinian contains countless examples of Catalanisms and Hispanisms and that they regard social life, public administration, the religious and cultural sphere.

1718 is the year of the London treaty which assigns Sardinia to Victor Amadeus II of Savoy.

How many Sardinians were aware of this diplomatic accord? If they had known about it, would they have been favourable or not? And would they ever have been able to imagine the future results of this bond that was being forged with the Piedmont dukedom and which would have transformed two regions, each with a completely different history in the fulcrum of the Italian unification process?

We now have enough information to allow us to reconstruct a complex page in the Island's history, marked by the crossing of another frontier, by the birth of a different nostalgia, by the generation of a great number of expectations and just as many controversies. We have the memory of the mighty Spain, the sense of frustration for the link with the tiny Piedmont and the bitterness on discovering that the Savoy household were not pleased with their new possession; there is the feeling of satisfaction for the recovery of an ancient and never extinguished notion of Italian spirit and there is the idea of self, seen in the dimension of a sardità that history continues to oppress. There are the day to day problems of a population made up of around 300000 people (11 inhabitants per sq km) scattered on a land lacking in means of communication, vulnerable, malarial, stripped for centuries of the most meagre monetary resources.

A difficult situation from a political and economic point of view but rich and full of life in the field of culture and language. Spanish is on the decline (but does not disappear); Sardinian remains and finds dignity and elaboration on the written page; Italian becomes widespread, a language with which there had once been a close acquaintance.

This was a season of revival destined to come to an end in the last part of the eighteenth century, when internal affairs were interwoven with the events of European politics. The arrival of a French fleet, sent to conquer Sardinia, almost acted as the detonator. The Sards fought off the onslaught; the victory exalted their strength and at the same time, their exasperation with the arrogance of the Piedmontese. This resulted in the days in 1794 when, with exemplary courtesy, the oppressors were accompanied to their ships and embarked with all their possessions, including the wealth they had accumulated during their exercise of power on the Island.

It was in this context that Giovanni Maria Angioy's uprising came to fruition, probably a chance at taking one last shot when all other hopes of seeing conditions improving on the Island had failed. This revolutionary event was subsequent to a period of fierce repression that led to a bloodbath in Sardinia, suffocating every hope and inaugurating a process of restoration almost fifteen years before the whole of Europe, with the Congress of Vienna, faced up to a similar test.

These events, the complexity and fascination of a rich and adventure-filled page in history, as well as the human aspect that is directly involved, are effectively described in Vincenzo Sulis's (1758-1834) Autobiografia, written in an Italian language where the sounds and meanings of all the languages spoken in Sardinia are mixed together.

Whatever we may make of it, there can be no doubt at all about the fact that during the nineteenth century the Island's history comes to a radical turning point.

1847 is the year of the perfect alliance with which the Sardinians, after a great deal of controversy, chose to renounce their very own institutional privileges to unite with Piedmont. The following processes of the Risorgimento follow a course which in a good measure is largely consistent with the choices made by the writers and scholars who in the second half of the nineteenth century, chose to express themselves in the Italian language, even when they were composing works that focused attention on the destiny of the Sardinian homeland and the virtues of the ancient heroes in different moments of history.

A fact which might even seem contradictory, unless we consider that once again the Sards have chosen to make use of the language seen as being the most effective in the given circumstances, making use of the language skills which they possess and have possessed for centuries, acquired by need or by choice and which they are capable of using separately or mixed together, in any case disclosing their own language, the “native” one, even when written in another idiom.

1861 is the year of Italian Unity, born from the action of two outlying regions and destined to be expressed in a way that did not guarantee a balanced and harmonious life between the different parts of the nation.

Literary works, on both the thematic and linguistic level, provide us with some information which is just as logical as it is difficult to explain: nineteenth century writers feel both Sardinian and Italian at the same time. And they choose to write in Italian. It is difficult to think that the very idea of political sardism could ever have arisen without Enrico Costa (1841-1909) who in every one of his works sets about exhorting Sardinians to consider their history. Nonetheless, Costa wrote his major historical, literary work of the geographical illustration of Sardinia in Italian. And likewise did the other authors operating in an age marked by Romanticism, by the rediscovery of the concept of people and by the idea of nation.

The twentieth century opens with the novels and tales of Grazia Deledda (1871-1936), the writer who received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1926, and with the verses of Sebastiano Satta (1867-1914); two different ways of representing in the Italian language an inner life strongly marked by the insular universe where the authors were born and received their education.

And a number of other writers will do the same, each one elaborating their own style, enhanced by the comparison with the concepts being expressed contemporaneously in Italy, Europe and the rest of the world. To name but a few: Emilio Lussu (1890-1975), Giuseppe Dessì (1909-1977), Salvatore Satta (1902-1975), Benvenuto Lobina (1914-1993), Sergio Atzeni (1952-1995) – working in the first half and then in the second half of the century when, after the World War, the Kingdom of Italy is transformed into a Republic (1946) and Sardinia receives a Statute that ratifies its special autonomy (1948).

But we have no intention of talking of individuals in this summary but rather of a trend line, of the expression of a welthanschauung in which it is possible to find shared features, concepts and expressions, the emergence and the entwining of the languages used in one's own milieu, in orality and writing, in thoughts and in prayer.

Everyone, in their own personal way, expresses the idea of an identity, the result of a slow process of life, reflection and study, which is developed and enhanced, which changes (and sometimes invents) making the most of moments of contact and knowledge. Eventually there comes the realisation of the existence of multiple and complex dimensions of identity even greater than those which characterise each ethno historical individuality and which contribute to widening the borders of every homeland, be it small or big.

For example, Giuseppe Dessì and Sergio Atzeni share such a way of interpreting the theme of identity: they have both reflected on and recounted Sardinia, animated by passion and rationality, without ever precluding the observation and the comprehension of wider horizons. Perhaps this is why, for their being Sard, Italian and European and for having succeeded in giving a narrative representation of this complex tangle of identities, they have left a significant mark on contemporary literary production.

On the basis of these elements, one can look at the Sardinians' cultural and literary history as if it were a means of getting ready to encounter the future: obliged by destiny to anticipate the times of globalisation, uprooted from their villages and catapulted into the big wide world of international relations, used to dealing with Phoenicians and Romans, with Catalans and Aragonese, with Piedmontese and Italians, accustomed to using their own language and that of the others and to studying the cultures of extremely powerful nations with whom they must have had perhaps even more complex relations than those found in web navigation, they can be considered capable of tackling the difficulties of the present and of being ready for the future. As long as they do not forget their history and know how to learn from it.

Giuseppe Marci is Full Professor of Italian Philology at the Faculty of Foreign Languages at the University of Cagliari. He also teaches Sardinian Literature at the Faculty of Arts and Humanities. He previously taught at the University of Sassari.

He is Director of the Centro di Studi Filologici Sardi (Centre for Sardinian Philological Studies) and editor of the series “Sardinian authors”

He is active in the field of literary journalism. He was the founder and editor-in-chief of the journal “Nae. Trimestrale di cultura” (2002-2008).

His main area of research is the development of Italian literature in the different regions, especially focussing on Sardinia and Sicily.

He has written on eighteenth-century autobiographies (Giacomo Casanova) and on twentieth-century novels (Beppe Fenoglio, Sergio Atzeni).

He has published editions of eighteenth-century didactic authors (Domenico Simon, Giuseppe Cossu, Antonio Porqueddu, Andrea Manca dell'Arca, Pietro Leo), nineteenth-century autobiographers (Vincenzo Sulis) and writers (Salvatore Satta) and twentieth-century autobiographers (Umberto Cardia).

He has also published the book In presenza di tutte le lingue del mondo. Letteratura sarda, in which he reconstructs the development of Sardinian literature, in order to investigate the theme of the literary canon and the relation between “main” literary traditions and the literary products of marginal and peripheral areas.
